LLYC IN THE ELECTIONS BRAZIL 2022

The run-off election between sitting President Bolsonaro and former President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, confirms the trends shown in polls since the candidates declared they were running. Bolsonaro took advantage of the economic measures implemented by his government and, with the support of the state apparatus, got into the run-off. Lula, on the other hand, managed to overcome the rejection the PT has suffered in the country and pulled together a broad base of supporters in various social, cultural, and economic sectors.

The two candidates will have another 28 days of intense disputes and discussions, which should be intensified as the strategies established prove fruitful or otherwise. Similarly, they will also seek support from governors-elect and the candidates who will be in the runoff in the states, to raise their profiles and get into regions and places where they want to grow, or need to consolidate.

GOVERNADORES

In addition to the President of the Republic, the States of the Federation and the Federal District also elected their Governors for the next four years. We had 15 states having their election decided in the first round, while in 12 states there will be a runoff on October 30. The political party that most elected governors was PT, consolidating its position as a political force, while traditional parties such as the PT and PSDB failed to elect a significant number of Governors in the First Round, which will lead to reflection on political-regional positioning for the 2026 elections.

NEXT STEPS

Confirmation of a second round, to be held on October 30, demonstrates an increasingly divided and riven country. The two candidates will have to reverse rejection rates in voters and consolidate their bases in the States. For Bolsonaro, from a demographic point of view, it will be important to improve among women and younger people and, from a geographical point of view, in the North and Northeast. Lula, on the other hand, should seek to do better among men and Evangelicals, while improving in the South. Attacks by candidates are expected to intensify, which could spark more violence among supporters.
